It may be cold outside, but nature is built to survive

WHITE TAILED DEER IN WINTER • WIKI COMMONS

It is no secret that Michigan winters can sometimes be a challenge, and not just for people, but for wildlife as well. On certain days where the temperatures drop well below freezing, and with the wind, the snow, and freezing rain, one might think that these bitter temperatures would cause deer and other wildlife to freeze to death. I have heard people say, “Oh, I feel so sorry for the little bunnies and the deer when it gets cold outside.” The fact is, deer, rabbits, and other wildlife critters can survive temperatures well below freezing. If you have ever worn a rabbit fur-lined hat (these fell out of popularity in the 1980s when PETA was formed), you know how warm the bunnies feel. You can still buy these hats in places like Cabela’s or Jay’s Sporting Goods. My point is that nature is well-equipped to survive the elements.

Whitetail deer have plenty of hair. Humans have anywhere from 80,000 to 150,000 hairs on their heads. Deer, in contrast, have two types of hair; they have approximately 250,000 soft, inner hairs that are dense, woolly, and provide an insulation barrier for the deer. They also have about 50,000 outer or “guard hairs.” These guard hairs grow longer and thicker during the winter months. These hairs not only protect the deer against bugs but are hollow and trap the air that is heated by their body. They also add an extra layer of insulation and block the cold wind. Most fascinating is that they deflect water. This is how a deer can lie in the snow, and the snow won’t melt. During the winter, these outer hairs turn darker in color, and they absorb more solar radiation to keep the deer warmer, and which saves them energy by reducing the need to keep moving to stay warm.

Many deer hunters will notice that on a cold day, but on sunny days, the deer will lie down during the day and take naps. Lastly, deer have a built-in thermostat. Deer can raise or lower these outer guard hairs with tiny muscles called arrector pili, thus adding to their insulation. Cottontail rabbits have these same two types of hairs that keep them toasty warm in the winter. Mice do NOT have these types of hair, which is one reason why, when the snow flies, people get mice in their homes.

So don’t worry about the deer and bunny rabbits freezing. They are well adapted to surviving the frigid weather, freezing rain, and snow. Hmmm . . . I am bald; this explains one reason why I get so cold during the winter!
